Volume 19, Edition 3

Editor: Louis R. Avallone

March 2014

This Month's Meeting

Speaker for this month's luncheon at 12 noon on Tuesday, March 4 at the Clarion Hotel on E. 70th Street will be State Rep. Thomas Carmody, Jr., who is a real estate broker from Shreveport, and who has been a Republican member of the Louisiana House of Representatives from District 6 in Caddo and Bossier parishes since 2008.

He graduated from Jesuit High School in Shreveport, and later graduated from Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge. Prior to his election to the legislature, Carmody served two terms (1998 - 2002 and 2002 -2006) as the District C member of the Shreveport City Council, which covers much of the same territory as House District 6, including the communities of Broadmoor, South Highlands and Pierremont, which are situated along Youree Drive, Kings Highway, and Line Avenue. In 2003, councilman Carmody pushed for an independent review of the police-related shooting death of Marquise Hudspeth, which at the time attracted national headlines.

Carmody serves on the House Commerce, Education, and the Agriculture, Forestry, Aquaculture and Rural Development committees, as well as the House Committee on Enrollment. He ran for the House as a fiscal conservative and successfully worked to repeal the Stelly Plan, which had increased progressive state income taxes, along with a decrease in regressive sales taxes. He has worked to fund public education and to protect youth from abuse. He secured passage in 2009 of a bill that strengthened penalties involving the crime of indecent behavior with juveniles. He has pushed to fund completion of Interstate 49 from Shreveport to the Arkansas border.

Thomas and his wife, Wendy, are parents to Rose Marie, and they are members of St. Josephs Church in Shreveport.

Reservations not required. Eating is $13 and there is no cost to listen. Parking is free.

"I'm a Corner Cutting Politician"

You may have heard that Edwin Edwards is planning to run for Congress. The seat that he's targeting is a central Louisiana district that includes Baton Rouge and stretches down to grab both parts of Acadiana and some New Orleans suburbs. It is a deeply Republican district currently held by Bill Cassidy who is giving up the seat to run for Senate against incumbent Democrat Mary Landrieu.

Edwards acknowledged he faces obstacles -- he is 86 and spent eight years in a federal penitentiary after a conviction for racketeering. But Edwards insisted, "I'm the only hope the Democrats have here." Voters who wouldn't support him because of his criminal background, he added, "wouldn't have voted for me anyway." As for the age issue, Edwards said: "I hope that's all they talk about." There are currently 11 members of Congress who are 80 or older. Edwards is the longest-serving governor in the state's history. Judging by total votes, he is the most popular Democrat in modern Louisiana history.

He is also a free-wheeling, fun-loving, self-described "corner-cutting" politician who seems to relish his controversies. In one of his trials, the sequestered jury was accused of stealing towels from the hotel they were in. Edwards concluded that he was truly judged by a jury of his peers.

Free Japanese Lessons Offered

By Louis R. Avallone

In the 1980s, the Japanese changed American culture in many different and significant ways. Now, they look poised to do it all over again, but this time, by teaching us a history lesson. Here's what I mean:

In the late 1980s, Japan was the world's second largest economy. Japanese automakers entered the U.S. market with small economy cars and pickup trucks that Detroit simply wasn't interested in making (at the time, at least). Japanese companies, such as Sony and Toshiba, developed the transistor radio and the Walkman. The Japanese were so resourceful that they even took products developed by U.S. companies, such as VCRs, camcorders, and microwave ovens, and made them affordable to the masses.

But oh how the mighty can fall. And Japan certainly did. Over the past 20 years, Japan's annual rate of economic growth has averaged a mere 1% and last year their population reached its lowest number since the 1950s. And their population is getting older, as well. There are 30 million Japanese who are 65 or older (which is 25% of their population).

Their birth rate is still below their death rate, and that just signals more trouble ahead, as the Japanese face rising welfare and medical care costs for an aging population, while coping with a rapidly dropping workforce due to fewer births.

Around 1990, though, when the Japanese economy began its spiraling descent and unemployment rose, Japanese young people welcomed the chance to "find themselves", or the liberty "to not be job-locked, but to follow their passion," as Nancy Pelosi, and other Democrats would say. But now, 20 years later, being "job-locked" doesn't sound so bad, after all.

Why? Well, almost one-third of those Japanese young people, now in their late 30s and early 40s, do not hold regular jobs, and some never have.

Only half of working 15-to-24-year-olds in Japan have regular jobs. And if you can't find a good job, then you don't learn new skills, and that generally means you can't earn or spend enough to get the economy moving again.

If all of this sounds similar to the United States, you'd be right on the money. The unemployment rate for 18-29-year-olds in our country, including those who have given up looking for work, is almost 16%. Among African-Americans in this same age bracket, the unemployment rate is almost a whopping 25%.

It's so bad that even the Obama administration admitted last month that there are 3 unemployed people for every job opening in our country today.

And our country's economic growth rate is expected to remain stagnant again this year (just like Japan's), and our population continues to shrink (just like Japan's). In fact, population growth is so low right now in the U.S. that you have to go back to the Great Depression in the 1930s to find a lower growth rate.

So when Democrats, like Nancy Pelosi, start making ridiculous claims, such as how Obamacare will "shift how people make a living and reach their aspirations," it's time to tell this Japanese history lesson, and have a come-to-Jesus meeting with Democrats.

They may be interested in learning that 20 years later, the once young and unemployed Japanese, who were seeking their "aspirations" as 20-something year olds, have remained unemployed as 40-something year olds, as well.

And although these folks never got "job-locked" from pursuing their passion, they also never learned new skills that would earn them enough to boost their country's economic growth beyond a paltry 1%.

We need an economy that encourages job creation and personal responsibility, not "finding yourself" when you have bills to pay. Without more jobs, we'll end up just like Japan, where our unemployed 20-something year olds, will become 40-something year olds, still looking for work.

There's nothing wrong with hard work, even when it's not your "passion". Or being "job locked", or whatever that really means to the growing number of Democrats using that term. You see, and what they don't get, it's not so much what you get from working hard, but it's what you become by working hard.

This is how Japan is poised to change American culture again, if we will only heed the lessons they have learned over the past 20 years. Our country's future may literally depend on it.
